“ Karen Scott was the most stubborn woman I’ve ever met. Stubborn not in a bad way. But stubborn in a very good way. Karen fought hard. She fought hard for the right to live life on her own terms. To live life by her own definition. She fought constantly to not be defined by others. She fought hard against coercive treatment by the medical community, the justice system and the mental health system. And she fought to ensure the notion that everyone, regardless of who they were, where they came from or what their personal history might be would also be able live life on their own terms. Karen was the MHA version of Rocky. You could never count her out. No matter how beaten down or defeated she may have seemed, Karen always got back up. She always persevered. Being a fighter was just one small part of Karen. Karen loved hard too. Everyone and I mean everyone, knew how much Karen loved her family- especially those grandbabies! But she also shared her love with her friends, co-workers and peers. In the evenings Karen would often stop by my office door sharing a bit of her day, her concerns about others and things she would have learned. Always self deprecating and seldom willing to accept a compliment she would leave two or three little chocolates on the corner of my desk. Her way of telling me she cared. I miss those interactions. I miss the chocolate. But most of all I will miss my friend Karen.

“ My favorite Karen personality trait is that you always knew where you stood with her. That is what I appreciated the most; she was genuine. We’ve lost a good one. I send my deepest condolences to her family and friends who loved her so much.
